Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Territorial Buildings of Alva, Oklahoma, comprise thirteen buildings dating from 1901 to 1905. They are located in a three block area facing towards the Woods County Courthouse. (See attached map) Ranging from one to two stories in height, they were erected for retail shops, offices, banks and other commercial establishments.

The architecture is consistently Plains Commercial. All of the buildings are of red brick masonry and have decorative elements in the forms of friezes, pilaster strips, semi-elliptical arched windows, and contrasting window sills and stringcourses.

The most distinctive feature of the buildings is that they form coherent blocks of period buildings. There are harmonies of style and size, similarities of decorative elements, and horizontal alignments through the use of bands of upper story windows, continuous friezes, stringcourses, and awnings. These buildings, once part of a thriving, territorial town square, make a clear statement of the historical context out of which they were born.

For descriptions of individual buildings see continuation sheets.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The significance of the Territorial Buildings of Alva is that they are an excellent example of the architectural style prevalent in early twentieth-century Oklahoma. Moreover, they bear strong witness to the rapid commercial development of one of the last urban frontiers of the United States.

Established in 1886, when the Sante Fe Railroad was extended through Indian Territory, the town of Alva was a mere whistle stop. Its name derived from the founder, Alva Adams, an attorney for the railroad. With the opening of the Cherokee Outlet in 1893--the last great land rush--the town boomed. Within a year the present layout of streets and lots into a small, tight town square was established. The original buildings were frame. From 1901 to 1905, the territorial years of Oklahoma, however, major reconstruction took place; substantial red brick structures replaced the older buildings.

The construction of the brick buildings was a clear sign of Alva's prosperity in the early twentieth century. Alva was the political center of one of the largest western counties--being the Woods County seat--and the economic center of a more extensive area. The early economy of the town was based upon the railroad, wheat agriculture, and a local college. Farmers from across Woods and the surrounding counties brought their wheat to Alva, the central shipping point. While in town they attended to their financial matters at the banks, made purchases at the various mercantile stores, and frequented the other commercial establishments in the square. The prominence of wheat agriculture also led to the development of a large milling industry that brought additional prosperity to the community. The Alva stores and businesses also served during territorial times a growing community of students and faculty from the Northwestern State Normal School (now called Northwestern Oklahoma State University), which was founded in 1897 just four blocks from the town square.

The architecture of the territorial buildings--thirteen brick structures erected from 1901 to 1905--was of a type that reflected the style and environment of the period. Plains Commercial style was the prevalent architecture in the other urban cities of western Oklahoma. The red earth colors of the construction material and the strong, simple lines--reminscient of the modest frame buildings--fit the roughness of the newly settled area. Yet the decorative features--friezes, arched windows, and stringcourses--demonstrate the aspirations of a modest but growing community.
